Margaret Lamb has given me her love and support, encouragement, advice, and assistance of many kinds during the years this book has been taking shape. I only hope that I have gone some way to reciprocating.

Robert A. Gross provided ideas and enthusiastic encouragement from the early days of research, read the manuscript in various versions, and generously took the time to make comments. I have shared my interests with David Jaffee over many years; he too read the manuscript and gave helpful criticism, which I hope has improved the end result. Roy Rosenzweig took a generous interest in the project, read the manuscript, and gave comments and support at a crucial moment. I am grateful, too, for the suggestions of an anonymous publisher's reader.

Many other friends and colleagues have contributed to the project in different ways, and I thank them all. Conversations or correspondence with Michael Bellesiles, John Brooke, Richard D. Brown, Jeanne Chase, Nancy Folbre, Ritchie Garrison, William J. Gilmore, Mark Kaplanoff, Barbara Karsky, Gary Kulik, Jonathan Prude, Mick Reed, Winifred Rothenberg, Barbara Clark Smith, Alan Taylor, Daniel Vickers, and Marta Wagner helped me greatly. So did the comments of participants in conferences or seminars in Atlanta, London, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Paris, Washington, and York. Stephan Thernstrom oversaw my original research. Gregory H. Nobles welcomed me to the Connecticut Valley when I started work and has been generous in his support ever since; Stephen Nissenbaum has been a staunch friend of this project; Christopher M. Jedrey took a close interest from the start and maintained it over the years; Adrian Leftwich convinced me that the effort was worthwhile when it looked as if it wasn't and helped me see what was important and what was not. started the thing off; Michael Merrill provided the sparks that really got it going and has given ideas and encouragement since. John Bukowczyk and Jonathan Schneer have been invaluable comrades.

When I began research, I barely realized the potential of the many thousands of documents in local libraries and other collections. I owe a particular debt to librarians for helping me find and use them. Philip Cronenwett, then curator of special collections at the Jones Library, Amherst, let me range through the manuscripts he had recently cataloged; without his assistance the project would have been much the poorer. His successors, especially Daniel Lombardo, and other staff at the Jones Library helped me on many occasions. So did Stanley Greenberg and Blaise Bisaillon of the Forbes Library, Northampton; both in the months when I virtually lived in the place and when I made brief return visits later, they and other staff of the Forbes gave unstinting assistance; I am particularly grateful to Blaise Bisaillon for arranging the interlibrary loans that enabled me to use the Hampshire Gazette in England. Members and staff of many other institutions have also helped: the Northampton Historical Society; Porter-Phelps-Huntington House, Hadley; the Williamsburg Historical Society; David Proper and staff at the Pocumtuck Valley Memorial Association Library, Deerfield; the town clerks' offices of Amherst and Westhampton and the city clerk's office, Northampton; the clerks of the superior and district courts of Hampshire County and their staff; the Hampshire County registers of probate and of deeds and their staff; Joseph Banukiewicz of the Worcester County Sheriff's Dept., who most cheerfully dug out from storage at Worcester State Hospital boxes of court records for me to use; the Manuscripts and Archives Department, Baker Library, Harvard Business School; Houghton Library, Harvard University; the Boston Public Library; the Research Library, Old Sturbridge Village; the New England Historic Genealogical Society; Amherst College Archives; Susan Grigg and her staff at the Sophia Smith Collection and Smith College Archives; the Massachusetts State Library; the Massachusetts Archives; the Northampton Institution for Savings; the Library of Congress; the British Library Reference Division, Bloomsbury; the British Newspaper Library, Colindale; the British Library Document Supply Centre, Boston Spa; the Brotherton Library, University of Leeds; Cambridge University Library; and—in particular—the Inter-Library Loan Department of the J. B. Morrell Library, University of York. Robert Fletcher, of the University of York's computing service, helped me prepare the map.

Financial support of various kinds helped me bring the project to fruition. The American Antiquarian Society in Worcester awarded me a Samuel Foster Haven Fellowship for the summer of 1982, which not only permitted me to work on another topic but gave me access to a range of printed and manuscript sources that have greatly influenced the present book. I am especially grateful for the enthusiastic assistance of many of the society’s staff, then and on subsequent occasions. A travel award from the Twenty-Seven Foundation enabled me to travel to the United States to conduct essential research another summer. The Master and Fellows of Selwyn College, Cambridge, in electing me to the Keasbey Research Fellowship in American Studies for a year, provided me with the time and opportunity to write a first draft. Finally, another award for a different project, a Smithsonian Postdoctoral Fellowship at the National Museum of American History, Washington D.C., gave me invaluable opportunities to discuss and rethink the work I had done.

I thank Peter Agree, Marilyn M. Sale, and the other staff of Cornell University Press, whose enthusiasm and efficiency has brought this book into the light of day, and my copyeditor Joanne S. Ainsworth, whose thoughtful and painstaking work has made the book better than it would otherwise have been.

I am grateful for hospitality from Chris and Micheline Jedrey, Bob and Ann Gross, and Warren Leon and Cindy Robinson during various research trips. I wish to give special thanks to my friends Carol MacColl and Don Michak of Northampton, who have been generous on so many occasions, and to Annie S. Lamb of Lebanon and Willimantic, Connecticut, who has helped often and in many ways.
