Gratitude goes first to my local posse, my colleagues and friends Anshu Chatterjee, Michael Malley, and Rodrigo Nieto-Gomez. They supported me through the process, by variously listening, lighting a fire under me when I needed it, and giving feedback. I owe a special debt to Anshu, who motivated and pushed me in just the right ways at different points from beginning to end. Mike gave me an initial push and discussed the ideas with me until the research was well underway. Rodrigo’s friendship and academic feedback then took over and saw me into the writing process. They gave short pieces of advice or listened to my long monologues as I worked out the material. Invariably, it was exactly what I needed at the time.

Many people supported me and discussed my developing ideas. Early on, I was encouraged by positive feedback and long conversations with Jill Schwedler, Joel Beinin, Fred Lawson, and Harold Trinkunas. Mohammed Hafez and later Clay Moltz, in their roles as colleagues and chairs of my department, provided feedback and supported my ability to devote time to writing. Julie Chernov Hwang helped me with the initial organizing of the book, and continued to listen when I needed to work things out. Dianna Beardslee was a supportive friend throughout, brain-storming with me at times. Productive discussions with Roger Hayden at Cornell University Press helped shape and improve the book. I am grateful also to the two book reviewers, who provided timely comments, helping to improve the book.

Aysar Hammoudeh was a fabulous, tireless researcher helping me to compile and translate primary sources. My former student, Stephen Klingseis, researched the effects of the refugees on water, which we subsequently published as an article. I draw from our findings in chapter 2. My research benefited from the wonderful Greta Marlatt at the Dudley Knox library, who helped me generously in searching and citation advice. Rachel Templer edited my chapters and kept me to a tight schedule. Her skill in catching errors and suggesting improvements was invaluable. The Minerva Research Initiative funded other research before the book that helped to feed ideas for this work. The Abbasi Program in Islamic Studies at Stanford provided me with an institutional affiliation, for which I am grateful.

Many Jordanians and Lebanese generously spoke with me, provided networks, aid, and hospitality. Some prefer to remain nameless; others I anonymize due to the intensely political climate. In Lebanon I owe many thanks to Rabih Shibli, who helped me with networks and contacts. Special thanks go to Omar Tantawi and Omar El Maadarani for their time and connections, taking me to far-flung areas of Lebanon and arranging interviews. My husband’s relatives, Samira and Rabih Dabbous, provided my second home while I was in Beirut. They made me feel welcome, helping whenever I needed anything or just taking me to dinner. In Jordan, Lillian Frost provided contacts, connecting me to May Shalabieh and others. May, in turn, introduced me to more people and accompanied me to many research appointments. I benefited from her presence and friendship. Jumana Kawar conducted seed interviews and made connections for me during her trip to Jordan. My friends in Amman, Kolthoum Abdelhaq and her wonderful daughters, Sarah and Farah, provided my home-away-from-home in Amman, complete with great meals, coffee, and companionship during all my trips to Jordan. I miss them whenever I return to the United States.

Finally, a debt goes to my husband, Amer Saleh, my daughter, Zahra, my father, Raymond Baylouny, and my late mother-in-law, Janan Saleh. They supported me continuously, taking over my family duties when I traveled or needed to write. I will miss the drunken conversations with my mother-in-law, who deserved an easier life than that of a refugee from Palestine, and who was later forced to leave her home in Kuwait along with so many others. My daughter was patient and helpful while I was writing or away on research. Being away from her was the hardest part of fieldwork, and I am grateful for family and friends who stepped in while I was away. My father’s faith in me, his support, and his pride in my accomplishments have remained solid during my journey from graduate school through today. My apologies to anyone I have forgotten to mention; it truly takes a community of scholars, friends, and family.
