This volume is the result of years of reading and thinking about Bernard of Clairvaux, and it would not have been possible without the support and inspiration of scholars such as Dom Jean Leclercq and Sir Richard Southern. Leclercq was kind and generous to me, while Sir Richard became a friend whom I will always miss. But I have also benefited from visits to Trappist-Cistercian abbeys, especially in the United States, but also in Ireland, England, Scotland, and Hong Kong. I think especially of the Cistercian brothers of Myrendal on the Danish island of Bornholm. Monks and nuns have made me welcome in their world and have shared their prayers and thoughts with me. The first to do so was Thomas Davis, formerly abbot of New Clairvaux in California, and he is one of many brothers who have been willing to share their thoughts and lives with me.

I am also grateful to Bernard McGinn, professor emeritus of the University of Chicago, who was one of the readers of the original manuscript and here as in so much else in our friendship has provided me with helpful criticisms and suggestions.

I am in debt to Michael West Oborne, friend since the third grade at Saint Augustine’s School in Oakland, California, in 1956. Michael has taken me to innumerable medieval Cistercian sites and has an unfailing interest in monastic history.

To my spouse of more than fifty years, Ann Kirstin Pedersen, I am thankful for her infinite patience with a distracted husband and her love of Cistercian life and spirituality.

I am also indebted to my friends E. Rozanne Elder and James France, who are fellow Cistercian scholars.

Finally, I want to thank Peter Potter, formerly editor in chief at Cornell University Press, and his successor, Mahinder Kingra, for their support in seeing this manuscript grow from thought to fact. Also thanks to Mary Kate Murphy, for her superb editing.
