Acknowledgments

I owe a great deal to Kent Mullikin and his staff at the National Humanities Center, where I worked on this book between September 1992 and May 1993. This project was also supported by funds awarded by Duke University Research Council and the Asian/Pacific Studies Institute of the University.

I am grateful to Howard Goldblatt and David Der-Wei Wang for reading the manuscript and offering invaluable suggestions for revision. No less an acknowledgment of appreciation is due to colleagues with whom I conversed at different stages of writing: Tani Barlow, Christopher Connery, Arif Dirlik, Prasenjit Duara, Judith Farquhar, Edward Gunn, Ted Huters, Fredric Jameson, Li Tuo, Victor Mair, Lisa Rofel, Mark Selden, Darko Suvin, Marilyn Young, Zhang Longxi, and Zhang Xudong. I also wish to thank Edward Martinique, the head of the East Asian Section at the Davis Library of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, for building the collection of contemporary Chinese literature and intellectual history at such a phenomenal pace. My thanks, also, to Leo Ching for brainstorming with me about subtitles, and to Gail Woods for her assistance in reformatting the notes.

Sheila Levine’s exquisite professionalism and support of this project made the final preparation of the manuscript a delightful task. My gratitude extends to Carolyn Hill, my copy editor, Scott Norton, my project director, and Wen-hsin Yeh, who connected me to the Press.
I remain indebted to friends near and far. And as always, no book could have been written without Candy’s generous understanding of her mother’s indulgence in scholarship.

I dedicate this book to Hitomi Endo, Tani Barlow, Miriam Cooke, and Ling-hsia Yeh, for the generosity of their hearts.
