Acknowledgments

In common speech, the word litany has unfortunately fallen on hard times. It has come to be associated with a formalistic recitation, rather than with multiple expressions of heartfelt gratitude. It is this latter sense I wish to recall here as I record my thanks to the many people who have given me so much help over the course of this project.

To the members of my dissertation committee at the University of California, Berkeley—Irwin Scheiner, Thomas C. Smith, and Robert N. Bellah: I hope they will not find this poor payment of the intellectual debts I have happily incurred over the past nine years. To my mentors and wise counsellors in Japan—Matsumoto Sannosuke, who guided my research at Tokyo University with grace and undue modesty; Maruyama Masao, who shared generously his time, reflections, convictions, and laughter; and Hashimoto Mitsuru, of Osaka University, for his exciting criticism and warm friendship. To Fukuda Kan'ichi and Tanaka Hiroshi, for sharing with me their extensive knowledge of Nanbara Shigeru and Hasegawa Nyozeikan, respectively, and for their practical assistance. To my parents and to my family in Japan: for what they gave there is no substitute.

Colleagues at Wesleyan University contributed in many ways. I would like to express special thanks to two who read the manuscript in an earlier form—David Titus, whose enthusiasm and insights have been welcome and gratifying; and Thomas James, now of Brown University, who gave deep and close thought to what he read, and often gave lucid expression in his own words to my still tangled thoughts. His has been a nourishing friendship, which I hope I have requited. Additionally, in sharing with me her thoughts on the past and present situation of Chinese intellectuals, Vera Schwarcz has provided a valued comparative perspective.

I wish here to thank the readers for the University of California Press for their comments and criticisms. Thanks also to Peter Dreyer for his patience and sharp editorial eye.

In the course of writing I have had the opportunity to present aspects of my research to a number of audiences, whom I wish now to thank: the Minzoku Mondai Kenkyūkai at Kyoto University, especially Naka Hisao, Takahashi Saburō, and Hashimoto Mitsuru; the New England Japan Seminar; the History Faculty Seminar, Wesleyan University; the Japan Forum, Harvard University; and, finally, the Japan Seminar, Columbia University. Each has in its own way helped to shape my thoughts on the subjects discussed in the following pages.

Were it not for financial support, of course, little if any scholarly work would be possible. Thanks are owing to the Fulbright-Hays Commission and the Social Science Research Council for research and travel support at the dissertation stage, and to Wesleyan University, particularly the Mansfield Freeman Fund, for a project grant and travel funds that made possible an additional summer's research and time out to think.

The end of my litany of thanks brings me to the greatest of all my debts, and that debt whose intellectual, spiritual, and material elements are as indistinguishable as they are profound: I speak of what I owe to my wife, Kimiko Nishimura. Here, I despair of speech. In expressing my thanks, I borrow the words, and hope, of Newman: cor ad cor loquitur.
