When this project began in 1997, the Cold War was still thawing and a study of a Communist photomonteur did not invariably meet with enthusiasm. I remain indebted to my earliest critical supporters: Anne M. Wagner, T. J. Clark, Martin Jay, and Anton Kaes. Crucial research funding was supplied by the Berlin Program for Advanced German and European Studies, jointly administered by the Freie Universität Berlin and the Social Science Research Council. I owe Karin Goihl particular thanks. At the Akademie der Künste, Berlin, I am grateful to Michael Krejsa, Director of the John Heartfield Archive, for his patient support; to Peter Zimmerman for his continuing scholarly generosity; and to Anita Metelka for her unfailing kindness and efficiency. Kari Dahlgren at the University of California Press has been elemental in helping this book become a reality; that the manuscript should find a home back in the location where it began is deeply satisfying. I could not have asked for a better editorial team: Jack Young and Steven Baker have helped make the book stronger and the painstaking process most enjoyable. Though embedded in its German-Californian roots, the international dimensions of support for this book have multiplied in splendidly unexpected ways. In the Republic of Ireland, I am grateful to my home institution, University College Cork, for a crucial sabbatical leave during challenging economic times. My colleagues in the History of Art Unit have been stalwart—Flavio Boggi, Simon Knowles, Ed Krčma, Jenifer Ní Ghrádaigh—as has Geoff Roberts in the School of History. The art seminar “Photography Theory,” organized by James Elkins and held at the University College Cork in 2005, proved to be vital to my understanding of photography, as were conversations with Margaret Iverson, Margaret Olin, Abigail Solomon-Godeau, and Joel Snyder; I am indebted to James Elkins for inviting me to write the introduction to the resultant book and for nearly a decade of critical support. The College of Arts, Celtic Studies, and Social Sciences, the School of History, and the History of Art department at the University College Cork and the National University of Ireland have generously provided publication grants, which I gratefully acknowledge. Laura Rascaroli, Anne O’Callaghan, and Kathleen James-Chakraborty are cherished sources of strength and encouragement. In the United Kingdom, Jo Applin, Seth Graham, John Krčma, Debbie Lewer, Jonathan Long, Frederic Schwartz, and Christian Weikop have bolstered and enriched my work in several ways. In Germany, I warmly thank Ralf Burmeister, Wolfgang Hesse, Antje Krause-Wahl, Roland März, Freya Mühlhaupt, Änne Söll, and Eckhard Siepmann. I received generous assistance at Amsterdam’s International Institute of Social History from Mieke Ijzermans and Ursula Langkau-Alex. In North America, Judith Brodie, Leah Dickeran, Thomas Haakenson, Andreas Huysen, Karen Kenkel, Katherine Kuenzli, Rudolf Kuenzli, Amy Lyford, Margaret MacNamidhe, Eve Meltzer, Bibiana Obler, Sergei Oushakine, Andreas Puskeiler, Anson Rabinbach, and Michael Thomas Taylor offered pivotal interventions. Anna Wexler Katsnelson provided characteristically incisive feedback on several chapters. Sally Stein’s sharp observations and discerning comments shifted important aspects of my argument. Andrés Zervigón became a fellow Heartfield traveler on the journey, ensuring a stimulating trip and providing buoyant company. Stephan Koch, my most steadfast ally, has tolerated the other Berliner in our lives with good humor, curiosity, and patience for nearly a decade and deserves my deepest thanks. This book is dedicated to my family, which nourished my investment in this particular moment in history long before I went to university, and whose lives have been indelibly marked by its aftermath. To the memory of my grandparents Elfriede Kriebel and Käthe and Helmut Becker, and of my father, Dr. Horst Kriebel, whose loving presences and sad stories haunt this book. To my mother, Christa, and brother, Norbert, in Southern California, who can hold and read it. This is for you.
