Acknowledgments

I began and finished this book in a room that overlooks Lake Michigan. Like the writing process, on some days the view is enveloped by white fog; on other days, the lake and the sky meet along a crisp blue line that seems to extend forever north and south. Many institutions have made this project possible. Even more people have illuminated my point of view, and have helped me bring this project into clearer focus. The first of these are the anonymous peer reviewers at the University of California Press whose generosity, plasticity of mind, and poignant critiques were crucial to transforming a ranging manuscript into a book. Equal thanks are due to my editor, Mary Francis, who has been an unfailing supporter of this interdisciplinary project ever since I first described it to her in 2007.

The publication of this book is made possible by generous donations from members of the Humanities Visiting Committee at the University of Chicago. In 2011–2012, I received a Faculty Fellowship at the Franke Institute for the Humanities, where I completed my research and took part in weekly writing workshops with a dynamic cohort of fellows who provided invaluable insight on this project. On the Hyde Park campus, I have found an unrivaled independence, and the support of colleagues whose imagination and generosity are matched only by their sense of intellectual freedom and rigor. My deep gratitude goes to James Chandler, whose incisive conversation and professional and intellectual magnanimity were essential to completing this book. Daniel Morgan offered his consummately perceptive feedback both early on, as I developed some of my central claims, and later as I wrestled with certain tensions in the manuscript. I am also beholden to D.N. Rodowick for his superior collegial and intellectual vivacity. His careful reading, enthusiasm, and advice have been nothing less than a spectacular gift. Alison James has been one of my most abiding interlocutors on the subject of the French avant-garde. I owe her much for sharing her literary expertise, and for always encouraging nuance when thinking about radical form. Rebecca West offered sage advice and encouragement at many crucial moments, as did Judy Hoffman, who has been an invaluable friend and colleague at every turn. Special thanks go to Marin Sarvé-Tarr, a talented art historian, and my indefatigable research assistant during the most critical periods of this project: your excellent work has made mine better. I am also grateful for Christina Peterson's research assistance, and Kym Lanzetta's and Katherina Loew's help with German language research and translation. Dan Bertsche and the France Chicago Center, and the attendees and student organizers of the Mass Culture Workshop, deserve my thanks for providing discussion forums during the project's developmental stages. The work and friendship of my colleagues in Cinema and Media Studies have inspired me along the course of writing this book: Dominique Blüher, Robert Bird, Xinyu Dong, Julia Gibbs, Tom Gunning, Loren Kruger, James Lastra, David Levin, Rochona Majumdar, Richard Neer, Noa Steimatsky, Jacqueline Stewart, Yuri Tsivian, and the late Miriam Hansen.

Beyond the South Side of Chicago, I have benefited from the feedback I received at the following institutions where I presented my research: the School of the Art Institute of Chicago, the Alice Kaplan Institute for the Humanities at Northwestern University, the University of California at Berkeley, Georgia State University, the University of Iowa, and the Fundación Telefónica. Thanks to the Association of Graduate Art Students at the University of Georgia, I was met with the timely insight of art historians Nell Andrew, Alisa Luxenberg, and Isabelle Wallace. At the 2011 Society for Cinema and Media Studies annual conference, Carlos Kase made key suggestions that impacted my thinking in important ways. Stéphanie Salmon welcomed me countless times to the Fondation Jérôme Seydoux-Pathé, where she provided invaluable research assistance, advice, and images. The archivists and librarians at La Cinémathèque Française, La Bibliothèque Nationale de France, Le Musée Gaumont, and La Bibliothèque Kandinsky, and Nancy Spiegel at the University of Chicago's Regenstein Library, were all essential to building the archive found within these pages.

Bernice Rose, a cherished adviser and friend, first gave me the opportunity to expand my study of Picasso and Braque in 2006, which was essential to the evolution of this project. With her expert eye, she taught me how to really look at, and question, Cubist pictures. Elza Adamowicz and Eric Robertson organized a conference on Dada in 2006, where I initially presented research for chapter 2, which appears in their collection Dada and Beyond, Volume 2 (Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2012). Michael Hammond graciously included my essay in Early Popular Visual Culture (2010), where I developed some of my ideas about Chaplin that appear in chapter 6. Each of the following people has helped me shape this project in different and subtle ways: Richard Abel, Karen Beckman, Angela Dalle Vacche, Mary Ann Doane, Susan Felleman, Bruce Jenkins, Sarah Keller, Rudolf Kuenzli, Eivind Røssack, Louis-Georges Schwartz, John-Paul Stonard, Aurélie Verdier, Christophe Wall-Romana, Linda Williams, and Lisa Zaher.

With unwavering support and energy, Karl Schoonover helped me navigate the choppy waters that sometimes accompanied this project, which bears the imprint of his friendship and intellectual fortitude. The scholarly buoyancy and creativity of Nick Davis and Christa Noelle Robbins has been an incentive both personally and intellectually. As always, I have counted on my friends and family in inestimable ways: Sony Devabhaktuni; Franck Le Gac; Lee Enger; Johanna Hibbard; Kelly Kress; Jason Livingston; Aaron and Anne Magnan-Park; Cecilia Sayad; Megan Twohey; Sasha Waters Freyer; Kris Woods; Peter O’Toole; Tim Schultz; Mary, Jim, and James Weller; Patrick Wild; and Rollyn Wild and Kathleen Campbell. My dear Christopher Wirtjes has sustained me time and time again with his humor, kindness, and unfailing love. I dedicate this book to the memory of my grandparents, Jack and Lorraine Wild, who introduced me to the cinema as a real space and place of becoming. And to Grace O’Toole, my great friend who is gone but never forgotten, this book is for you.
