Acknowledgments

I am deeply grateful to the many individuals and organizations in China who helped me carry out the field research for this book. My research in China was generously supported by the Rockefeller Foundation International Relations Fellowship, the National Academy of Sciences Committee on Scholarly Communication with the People’s Republic of China, and the University of California–San Diego.

My colleagues at UC–San Diego provided a stimulating, supportive environment in which to work out my ideas about communist political institutions. Most valuable were my almost daily discussions with Philip Roeder, who was writing his own book on Soviet political institutions; my teaching partnership with Mathew McCubbins, who was eager to reach beyond the United States to figure out how institutions work in other countries; and the patient help I received from Barry Naughton in understanding the Chinese economy. Other colleagues, especially Gary Cox, Francis Rosenbluth, T. J. Cheng, and Peter Gourevitch, cheerfully engaged me in many hours of conversation about the ideas in the book.

On other campuses, Christine Wong and James Tong shared information and ideas about the Chinese fiscal system. When I presented parts of the book at the University of California–Los Angeles, MIT, and Harvard, the tough questions helped me clarify my arguments. Robert Bates, Andrew Nathan, Michel Oksenberg, Lee Sands, Dorothy Solinger, and Andrew Walder read the entire manuscript and offered very valuable suggestions.

Zhao Suisheng, Michael Tierney, and Christopher Nevitt, graduate students at UC–San Diego, helped by acute questioning of arguments and tracking down sources. Joan Brunn did a fine job of manuscript preparation. Sheila Levine, Amy Klatzkin, and Dan Gunter at the University of California Press were a pleasure to work with during the publication process. Finally, I wish to thank Beverley Walton, Jaqueline Wheeler, Mary Tschosik, and, most of all, Jeanette Popkin, who took excellent care of my children while I was working on this book.
