ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

It is difficult to know where and when a project like this one begins and ends. Its themes were sparked by ads in the Paris metro, by random thoughts as I worked for a San Francisco newspaper, by notions that struck me when I adopted the apparently more serious posture of the student, huddled over her desk. Regardless of this dubious genesis, I can clearly identify those who have helped me through the long process of research and writing. Ann Henstrand, Mary Sims, Benjamin and Michael Lapp, and Professors Peter Brown and Martin Jay had particular influence on my early thoughts about images and culture. Later, as the study that would become this book took form, I was fortunate to be able to discuss the project with Professors Ira Lapidus, Todd Gitlin, and Aihwa Ong in Berkeley and Rémy Leveau in Paris. Paul Rabinow’s direction and comments have been crucial from the start; without his confidence and encouragement this project would certainly not have been possible.

Lawrence Michalak, Abdellah Hammoudi, Hassan Elboudrari, Pierre Bourdieu, Jean-François Clement, and Dale Eickelman all offered incisive remarks on the project that would become this book. Miriam Lowe, Yves Gonzalez-Quijano, Jim Fabion, Abderrahman Lakhssasi, and Mustapha Kamal read different chapters or versions of the dissertation on which this book is based. Hannah Davis attentively read the entire manuscript. Catherine Rouslin and Antonella Casellato generously sent me documents and materials difficult to obtain in Morocco. Naomi Schneider’s patience throughout the editing process has been decisive. I thank all of these people and my parents, Edward and Camille Ossman, as well as my sisters, Linda, Mary, Laura, Kathleen, and Julie, for their support.

Morocco has been an ideal, if complex, place to do research. I especially thank those who first welcomed me here: Saïd, Haja Touria, Fatima, Nejiba, Nadia, Amina, and the rest of their family. During my stay in Casablanca, André Taiëb, Viviane Simon, Edward Thomas, Adrienne Alvord, and Fatima Badri each helped me in his or her own way. Mati’s stories of Casablanca life, visible or concealed, played a special role in my understanding of the city. I am grateful too to the Institute of Journalism in Rabat, the British Film Institute, the AFEMAM (Association Française pour l’Étude du Monde Arabe et Musulman), Antoine Sfeir and Les Cahiers de l’Orient, the CERI, the University of Provence, La Maison de l’Orient in Lyon, and the IREMAM in Aix-en-Provence, all of which have provided forums to discuss some of the ideas developed in the course of this study. Many people who appear in the book will not find their names here. Pseudonyms replace the names of informants unless they have publicly signed the articles or speeches I cite.

Various stages of research for this study were made possible by grants. A Humanities Research Grant and a Lowie Grant from the Anthropology Department from the University of California at Berkeley provided funding for preliminary fieldwork. A Foreign Language Area Study scholarship enabled me to improve my Arabic. Research in France was made possible by a Bourse Chateaubriand, while fieldwork in Morocco was sponsored by the Institute of International Education and the Department of Education Grants for Doctoral Research.

The end of this project demands apologies to my son Nathanaël, who often complained about my intense preoccupation with my “computer,” but who is satisfied with my work now that it has been transformed into the palpable form of a book.
