A long-term book project is never the work of a single person. Rather, it is part of a collaborative effort with the assistance of family, friends, colleagues, and institutions. My first introduction to Kennett Square was made possible by a project supervised by Dr. David Hufford of the Hershey School of Medicine at Pennsylvania State University. Thank you, David, for providing the opportunity to find this community. I am indebted to the staff of Project Salud and La Comunidad Hispana, Inc. where I was assisted by a friendly and insightful staff who facilitated my introduction to the Mexican community in Kennett Square and offered invaluable advice and guidance. I especially thank Peggy Harris, Anita O’Connor, Annette Silva, Iris Ayala, Sergio Carmona, Howard Porter, Guillermo Rivera, and Margarita Quiñones.

Many Kennett Square residents agreed to participate in this study; others provided information and insights to the workings of the community. While I am thankful for the guidance of all of the residents of Kennett Square who were thoughtful and generous with their time, I wish to acknowledge several people who were particularly helpful. Joan Holiday offered her unconditional support; I am especially grateful that she allowed me to participate in the Bridging the Community meetings and introduced me to many Kennett Square residents. Vince Ghione arranged introductions and interviews with several mushroom farm owners; he also spoke with me at length about his career in the industry and the community, and thus he provided insights and perspectives that helped me understand the history of mushrooming in southeastern Pennsylvania. Isidro Rodríguez was a tremendous friend who supported my work in Mexico and Pennsylvania. I am forever grateful for his assistance in finding a house in Mexico and introducing me to his network of family and friends on both sides of the border.

I have spent many happy hours in the village I have identified as Textitlán, where I have developed what I hope will be lifelong friendships. Most significant was the love and friendship of the Rodríguez family: Maria and Benjamin, Lucia and Benjamin, Joel, Claudia and Erica, Benja, Diana, and Javier and Lucila. I also thank René Guzmán, Juan Rico García, Emilio and Elvia Guzmán, and the many others who agreed to be interviewed and provided access to archival documents that were invaluable to the success of this project. I also acknowledge Felipe Ortega, an outstanding research assistant and loyal friend. To the people of Textitlán I can only say that I admire you and am grateful for your willingness to share your lives and community with me.

My life and work have been blessed with amazing colleagues. Payal Gupta was an ideal compañera in the field, and Cory Thorne, Guillermo de los Reyes, Solimar Otero, Amanda Holmes, and Charlie Groth continue to be exceptional friends and colleagues. I especially thank Douglas Massey for his steadfast support and encouragement since the earliest days of this project.

At George Mason University, I thank Peggy Yocom for being a wise and devoted mentor. Working with Peggy has been a highlight of my career at GMU. Amelia Rutledge, Tamara Harvey, Shelley Reid, Devon Hodges, Steven Weinberger, Terry Zawacki, Eric Anderson, Robert Matz, and Alok Yadav are wonderful friends and colleagues. Joan Bristol, Zofia Burr, Amal Amireh, and Denise Albanese all read early versions of the manuscript and offered invaluable advice and encouragement. Carol Cleaveland read all of my later revisions; I thank Carol for her keen insights and for believing in me when I was ready to give up. Jason Morris and Kristina Downs were invaluable research assistants. Thank you both for the time and dedication you provided to this project. I also thank Deborah Kaplan for being the best department chair imaginable.

Thanks also to The Mexican Migration Project at Princeton University, which provided the opportunity to collect data for their project in Mexico, and George Mason University for providing the study leave that allowed me to finish my fieldwork in Mexico.

I have been blessed with the support of many friends and family. I thank Viktoria Ironpride for her careful editorial assistance and for serving as my first writing instructor. Marietta Damond provided invaluable support with my statistical analyses and providing play dates for my kids when deadlines were looming. Laura Scott and Dean Tacich have exceeded my expectations as supportive friends. Thank you for reading this book (sometimes under pressure) and providing your insights as writers and editors. Most of all, thank you for a friendship that I treasure. I thank my mother Frances Lattanzi, my late father Paul Lattanzi, my sister Susan Lattanzi, and my brother-in-law Jeff Kline for doing the things that families do so well—reminding me that there is more to life than work, watching the kids when I needed writing time, and just being there when I needed your love and support.

My children Helen and John provided the much-needed distractions that have kept my life balanced and joyous. Their sense of wonder with every new experience made our time in Mexico among my fondest memories. I dedicate this book to them. Finally to my husband Ken: I cannot put into words what your love, patience, and support mean to me. It has been a long road, but I’m still looking forward to our next adventure.
