Thanks are due to the many individuals and institutions that helped bring this work to fruition. The (very long) period I spent as a student at the University of California, Berkeley, shaped my research, as well as my firm belief in the importance of the public university. While there I had the pleasure of learning from and working with inspiring scholars and teachers. Kerwin Klein deserves special appreciation. His guidance, critique, and enthusiasm were instrumental at every stage. My work also benefitted greatly from the influence of David Hollinger, Colleen Lye, Kathleen Frydl, James Vernon, Mary Ryan, David Henkin, Robin Einhorn, Jennifer Burns, Jason Sokol, Dalia Muller, Camilo Trumper, Jocelyn Garovoy, and the late Jim Kettner.

Librarians and archivists around the country shared their expertise and their time. As usual, Theresa Salazar and Susan Snyder of Berkeley’s Bancroft Library were enormously helpful. Staff at the Library of Congress, Hoover Institution Library and Archives, Arizona Historical Foundation, John Hay Library at Brown University, Harry S. Truman Library, Ethnic Studies Library at Berkeley, Huntington Library, and Sterling Library at Yale also provided skilled assistance.

At Middlebury College I have found an extraordinary community of colleagues and friends. The Department of History has provided an ideal home base from which to develop as both a scholar and teacher. I would also like to especially thank those who read early drafts of the project: Maggie Clinton, Rachael Joo, Febe Armanios, Alexis Peri, Max Ward, Sarah Stroup, Holly Allen, and Roberto Lint Sagarena. Ian Barrow, Kathy Morse, Paul Monod, Amy Morsman, Jacob Tropp, Eddie Vazquez, Sepi Alavi, Roger White, Renee Brown, Anna Harlan, Jamie McCallum, Erin Davis, and Amy Yuen each made vital contributions whether they knew it or not, and I am glad of this chance to express how much I continue to appreciate their generosity.

My family deserves a great deal of the credit for this book’s existence. Words are not enough to thank my parents, Rosita and Ming, and my sister Grace for a lifetime of encouragement and support. The same holds true for my husband Ben Graves, whose love, patience, and humor have been constants throughout. He and our son Sinjin inspire me every day.
