This project was two decades in the making, so please forgive me if there are a lot of thank-yous! When I was a doctoral student, my good friend Mary Andres and I developed and cotaught a human sexuality elective course for social work students. I still think back fondly on the hours we spent prepping and debriefing, in a collaborative effort to ensure our students really grasped the concepts we were trying to convey. I am so grateful we decided to take that leap together. The foundation of that original course is present within this volume.

In the twenty years between that first course and today, I am so lucky to have taught sexuality to literally hundreds (getting close to thousands!) of students at the Silberman School of Social Work, Hunter College, City University of New York, in New York City. Our students are a unique group—diverse, committed, thoughtful, challenging, and focused on social justice. Their engagement with this material in the classroom and beyond has helped me grow as a social worker and teacher. This book is fully informed by our classroom interactions and activities, which have pushed me to think deeply about each topic. I look forward to growing even more as our students interact with this content.

After many years of percolating as an idea, this book became a reality because of the generous support of the deans of the Silberman School of Social Work. I am especially grateful to Dean Mary Cavanaugh, whose unwavering belief in the project, as well as guidance, and concrete supports were the difference in making this work possible. Additionally, Associate Dean Gary Mallon, a generous colleague and friend since even before I arrived in New York City, has been instrumental. His ongoing generosity extended this time to connecting me with Columbia University Press and my editor for this work. He also regularly checked in to see how the book was going and to offer encouragement. I have loved all the opportunities we have had to work together so far, and I look forward to many more. Associate Dean Caroline Gelman also has offered unwavering support and encouragement throughout and continues to be a valued colleague.

I am extremely appreciative of my editor, Stephen Wesley, at Columbia University Press, who has been enthusiastic from the beginning. He helped me lay out a clear timeline, nudged me at just the right moments to keep me moving forward, and provided excellent editorial support throughout. He also managed to tighten up my writing without losing my voice and got rid of almost every superfluous “that” I had sprinkled throughout! I want to thank Christian Winting, my assistant editor, who worked in tandem with Stephen to make sure the final product was put together as smoothly as possible. I appreciated his responsiveness and attention to detail. I am grateful for the support of the entire Columbia University Press team. I am also grateful to the anonymous reviewers who provided feedback on both the proposal and the full draft. I have no doubt that their thoughtful suggestions strengthened the final product.

I want to extend a special thank-you to Julia Bartz, whom I was lucky enough to have as my research assistant through the main part of this project. Julia went above and beyond, not only gathering literature and assembling references but also editing early drafts and offering thoughtful critiques and insights. I think without Julia this book would still be only half finished! In the final stages of the project I was very grateful to have another student, Ren Lee, provide assistance and even some computer graphics to make sure I met my deadline.
I’m a firm believer that it “takes a village.” I have a very special village supporting me in this and every endeavor. My colleagues at the Silberman School of Social Work provided the perfect mix of support and intellectual challenge. Maddy Petrow-Cohen offered encouragement as she listened to weekly progress reports over lunch with patience and enthusiasm. Julie Petrow-Cohen also cheered me on at every opportunity. Barbara Bickart and Bridget Hughes grounded me while making me laugh as we sat in front of their fire. Kathleen Bailie, Andrea Erickson, Ally Cherins, and Liz Hochberg (“Big Guts”) were amazing cheerleaders, nourishing me with food, drink, and laughter all along the way. Simon, my brother, and Susie, Alex, and Lucy were encouraging from afar. Mum and Dad beamed with pride, even if they weren’t exactly sure what it was I was writing about. And even though I moved to the United States over thirty years ago, I still feel their love and support as though they lived next door. Finally, to the family I am lucky enough to have created: Teddy, the newest addition, sat on my lap or lay next to me hoping crumbs from my chocolate chip scone (thank you, Able Baker) would drop on the floor. Emma and Jack are really the best kids anyone could wish for—full of love, caring, and compassion, with a good dose of adventure thrown in. They are even pretty good-humored about mom having books that say “sex” on them all over the dining room table. When I first came out as gay, the very idea that I could have children was beyond my imagination. The fact that I get to be a parent is the single greatest gift of my life. Laura made that gift possible. She has been on this journey with me since before that first class was taught. She is my rock and my joy. She challenges me to reach outside my comfort zone and take risks, yet she always makes me feel right at home. I feel so blessed to get to do life’s journey together—the Bo-Dos are my world.
