There are so many people and institutions to thank for their support of this book. The genesis of the project began ten years ago and has lead me on multiple paths where I met with and exchanged stories broadly with many communities. First, I must express my immense gratitude to my spiritual and biological family in Cuba, which consists of godmothers, godfathers, spirit guides, and divinities that have accompanied and continue to guide me along the way. Modupe, gracias to Tomasa, Tony, Soñia, Susy, José (iba e), Tita, Riguito, Maxi, Meche, and Devit. You have made my world bigger, better, and more hopeful.

Wendy Lochner and Amy Hollywood at Columbia University Press were remarkable editors and advocates of the work the book seeks to do with gender and religion. I cannot say enough about the positive support the press and its team, especially Lowell Frye and Susan Pensak, provided me in preparing the book for the world. Another special recognition goes to Dave Prout, my long-time indexer and editor who always takes on a challenge with grace.

The Women’s Studies in Religion Program at the Harvard Divinity School provided vital support for the initiation of this project. While at the WSRP, Ann Braude and Jacob Olupona were especially interested in my research. I am also deeply grateful that my experiences at HDS allowed me to connect with Aisha Beliso-De Jesús, a dear hermana who believed in what the spirits and I had to say about Afrolatinx religions. Aisha’s brilliance has influenced my development as a person, spiritually and intellectually.

The Ruth Landes Memorial Research Fund provided me with valuable resources for conducting research for this volume. Thank you to David Latham at the fund who provided institutional guidance for my archival studies and fieldwork. This support also allowed me to collaborate with the talented Cuban photographer Héctor Delgado, whose expertise in recording rituals in an ethically beautiful manner is unsurpassed.

The Smithsonian Institution’s National Anthropological Archives were instrumental in getting me the vital information on Ruth Landes for the completion of this volume. A special thank you goes out to Katherine Crowe and Daisy Njoku for their generous help at the archive. Carrie Beauchamp also provided wonderful assistance in looking at Landes’s material culture collection at the Anthropology Department of the Smithsonian’s Museum of Natural History.

The staff at the Cuban Heritage Collection at the University of Miami Libraries are familia that embraced me and this book since its inception. Their endless support of my investigation of the Lydia Cabrera Papers led to fruitful scholarly, artistic, and personal growth. Elizabeth Cerejido, Annie Sansone-Martinez, Amanda Moreno, and the amazing Gladys Gomes-Rossie generously offered their considerable knowledge and kindness to me during this project. I want to express my deep gratitude to Martin Tsang, the CHC’s librarian and curator of Latin American Collections, who provided the beautiful image that dons the cover of this volume. His perpetual encouragement and wisdom gave me much strength to find new ideas while doing this work.

The process of laboring through such an interdisciplinary and transnational topic meant that I built this work on the shoulders of giants. Much appreciation to anthropologists of Afrolatinx religions, J. Lorand Matory and Kristina Wirtz, for reading, commenting, and improving my research with their thoughtful suggestions. My colleagues in the field of folklore studies also provided essential feedback that helped the project to blossom. Mintzi Martínez-Rivera, Rachel González-Martín, Guillermo de los Reyes, Cory Thorne, Sabina Magliocco, Elaine Lawless, Kim Lau, Kay Turner, Norma Cantú, Mabel Cuesta, and Katey Borland all have participated with me at the many American Folklore Society meetings where I vetted this project in one form or another. Each one gave me unique insights that helped me to see how my studies could do more for our field and for the communities I work with and am a part of. Likewise, Ana-Maurine Lara, Alex Fernández, and Maria Hamilton Abegunde, all gifted practitioner-scholars-writers, kept me grounded and listening to what the egun, the dead, were asking me to say in this book.

Experts in the fields of multiethnic and Caribbean literature in the United States and Europe also listened graciously and promoted the transnational nature of my analysis of texts in this volume. John W. Lowe, William Boelhower, Hanétha Vété-Congolo, and Dorothea Fischer-Hornung all gave stimulating suggestions for interpreting the narratives I encountered in my research. Their critical readings allowed me to see the connections between written, oral, and embodied modes of storytelling.

Colleagues from the fields of Latinx theatre and performance studies welcomed this research with open arms. I offer special thanks to Lillian Manzor, Teresa Marrero, and Jorge Huerta for their encouragement and words of inspiration for my studies with Cuban spiritual performances. The HowlRound Theatre Commons was a fruitful space where people openly accepted and engaged with my scholarship. A warm mention must be made of playwright Femi Euba and historian Toyin Falola, two elder statesmen of Yoruba cultural studies who actively engaged with my diasporic subjects and ideas.

Louisiana State University’s College of Humanities and Social Sciences, through Dean Gaines Foster, provided sabbatical support and other resources for the volume. My colleagues and friends in the Department of English and the Program in Comparative Literature shared their expertise to improve this book’s accessibility to literary studies. I am grateful to Benjy Kahan, Katie Henninger, Elsie Michie, Sharon Weltman, Elena Castro, Chris Barrett, Angeletta Gourdine, Pallavi Rastogi, and Adelaide Russo for their input. Carolyn Ware, my fellow folklorist at LSU, helped me greatly by talking about fieldwork and writing with me. Helen Regis and Joyce Jackson, two gifted anthropologists who connect local cultures in Louisiana and Africa, also shared valuable perspectives on transcultural studies. Dear mentors Frank De Caro and Rosan Jordan gave me many hours of stories and lovingly guided me through the years of development of this project. Finally, my fantastic friends and colleagues, historian Cat Jacquet and gender studies scholar Liam Lair, provided me with unconditional kindness and confidence that helped me find the gumption to finish the book.

My new colleagues at Indiana University were also instrumental to this book’s completion. I am especially grateful to David McDonald, chair of the Department of Folklore and Ethnomusicology, for his enthusiasm for the volume. Ray Cashman, Pravina Shukla, Henry Glassie, and John McDowell also shared constructive commentary on the work. Historian and Latinx scholar John Nieto-Phillips was exceptionally positive and instrumental in generating support for my research at Indiana University. The American Folklore Society, particularly the previous director Tim Lloyd and the current director Jessica Turner, always welcomed and provided a forum for conversations that helped improve this book.

In no universe would I have been able to complete Archives of Conjure without the love, intelligence, and exceptional patience of my partner, Eric Mayer-García. He allowed me to see aspects of the study that profoundly impacted its meaning for me. A magnificent scholar of Latinx performance studies in his own right, Eric was by my side every step of the way during this research. My family, Rai Otero, Raymond Otero, Blanca and Roberto Alvarez, Luis García, and Soñia and Richard Mayer sincerely listened and gave me the strength to continue researching through sorrow, with joy.
