Acknowledgments

Acknowledging all of those who have helped me, in so many different ways, is both difficult and pleasing. I will never be satisfied with my ability to convey how much I value their contribution to the creation of this work. But I am pleased to try, and gratified to have the opportunity to recognize them publicly.

My husband, and friend, Sam Black, always assumed I could succeed, never doubting my competencies or my capacity to persevere. His unwavering confidence provided me with a quiet backdrop of assurance from which to work. Equally important, whenever I called upon him, he patiently spent time discussing ideas for my writing with me. When I felt most mired in the particulars of my data, his seemingly inherent ability to grasp the “big picture” advanced my thinking.

Julie Bondanza, long-time friend and respected colleague, also critically influenced my thinking throughout this endeavor. She read, and usefully commented on, many versions of my manuscript. Most significantly, her observations, along with Sam’s, allowed me to step back and understand what the book was about, and to write the concluding chapter to Part I.

Luckily for me, Betsy Cohn, another friend, also is a professional writer/consultant and competent teacher. I went to her for advice with the earliest versions of my manuscript. She started me off in the right direction by focusing my attention on the need to find my own voice in my writing.

There are still others: Mary Hunt supported me with her friendship, intelligence, and humor; she continues to do so. Shirley Cloyes, whom I had just met, kindly read an early draft, helping me significantly to reorganize and improve it. I also was a stranger to Carol Ochs, but she graciously agreed to talk to me about my ideas for the book when I made that request of her. And Harry Oliver, a wise and good man, spoke to me about the metaphysics of relatedness, and expanded my horizons.

I am grateful to Susan Koscielniak, executive editor at Columbia University Press, who found value in what I was doing. Her professionalism and receptivity gave me a most pleasant introduction to the world of book publishing. The thoroughness and interest of Joan McQuary, managing editor at Columbia University Press, made the editing and checking process, surprisingly, most enjoyable.

I hope my gratitude to the ninety-four women of this study is apparent. I will always appreciate their willingness to participate in this endeavor, and I will never forget that this work was possible because of them.
Women’s Psyche, Women’s Spirit