Acknowledgments

As I began reflecting on all the people, places, and practices that established the conditions that enabled Publicity’s Secret to be written, I was struck by the way that acknowledgments serve as a sort of academic prayer. More than a list of sponsors or funding agencies, that is to say, more than a commercial, acknowledgments are a way of giving thanks. They are not simply direct “thank you's,” as in the increasingly lost art of the thank-you note. Rather, acknowledgments are givings of thanks in the presence of others, ways to let others know for what and for whom one is thankful. And no doubt because these are academic acknowledgments, and the others are expected for the most part to be academic others of some sort, the list is partial, specific to its context, not a broad, inclusive enactment of thankfulness. [I’m thinking here of my grandfather’s Thanksgiving prayers. A good Southern Baptist, he could thank and thank until the children were crying and the gravy was lumpy. That may explain why my grandmother moved dinner time closer to the beginning of the day’s first football game—the game provided the necessary closure of the prayer.] In any case, I now give thanks.

The Institute for Human Sciences in Vienna, Austria, is wonderful. Its support, generosity, good food, and encouragement provided the ideal environment for finishing Publicity’s Secret. I am especially indebted to Cornelia Klinger, Klaus Nellen, and Anita Traninger for how they enriched my stay in Vienna.

I also thank Kjell Soleim and Haldis Haukanes of the Centre for Women’s and Gender Research at the University of Bergen, Norway. Their invitations to speak at the conferences Feminism 2000 [April 2000] and Sexual Difference: Beyond Constructivism [October 2000] instigated the reflections that became chapter 4.

Noortje Marres and Richard Rogers invited, criticized, inspired, taught, and entertained me in Budapest (July 2001, at a workshop on the social life of issues, "Competing Realities: The Social Lives of Issues on and off the Web") and Amsterdam (August 2001, at Maastricht Summer University, Better Than Fantasy: Reality Engineering and the Computer). Their work on issue networks on the Web helped me begin thinking more clearly about democratic alternatives to the public sphere. I hope to continue learning from and thinking with them.

Faculty research grants from Hobart and William Smith Colleges provided much needed financial support for this project. Challenges from HWS's political science students in the senior seminar on the public sphere provoked and sharpened some of the initial thinking that went into the book. Particularly helpful were Turk Johnson, Melissa Miller, and Aaron Trenor. I am also grateful to Andrew Heitman, Colleen McDonough, and Brian Whelan for their diligent and creative research assistance. Thanks as well to Paula Durbin-Westby for her careful work on the index and to manuscript editor Ange Romeo-Hall.

As is typical of academic work, many of the arguments in the book have benefited from comments, conversations, and criticisms that have taken place during panel discussions at meetings or during the question-and-answer period of seminars and talks. All too often some of the most helpful insights have come from someone whose name I don't know or who rushed out for coffee before I had a chance to catch them. At other times, the ideas emerged through the exchange itself, rather than coming from a specific remark. Nevertheless, I want to acknowledge the gift of these engagements. I also thank the following friends and colleagues for taking the time to read and comment on various chapters: Bill Chaloupka, Tom Dumm, Lee Quinby, Patchen Markell, Catherine Rice (my editor at Cornell University Press), Mike Shapiro, Alison Shonkwiler, John Shovlin, and Stephen White.

Paul Passavant has read countless drafts of the book's chapters. Even when disagreeing with some of the book's major claims (for example, that democracy can do without a notion of the public), he answered emergency phone calls and e-mails to help shore up my arguments when they started to wobble and I started to doubt them. He also provided that extra encouragement and support that got me through the lonely uncertainties of theory and writing. Thanks, then, to Paul, for the challenges and wonder you incite.
Early versions of chapters 1 and 3 were previously published in Political Theory and Theory and Event, respectively. They appear here with permission.

JODI DEAN

Vienna

December 16, 2001