ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

It is with great happiness that I acknowledge the many people and institutions who have helped me as I have worked on this book. I feel fortunate that contacts with others have been not simply helpful but invaluable and that the stereotype of the lonely and isolated scholar does not apply.

Time to research and write has been a precious commodity. I received financial assistance from the American Association of University Women; the Center for Study of Race and Ethnicity at Brown University; the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation; and Schlesinger Library, Radcliffe College. Thanks to the C. Boyden Gray Career Development Fund and the Junior Faculty Work-Study Program at Harvard University, I had the help of talented research assistants; Nathan Rein, Bradley Zakarin, and Kimberly Sims stared into microfilm machines for innumerable hours, checked facts, located illustrations, and tracked down details. Early on in this project, Kendra Lider-Johnson did very useful research for chapter 6.

This book owes a great deal to scholars and friends across disciplines. I have received invaluable criticisms and comments on work in progress from William Chafe, Susan Douglas, Mary Dudziak, Margaret Hunt, Molly Ladd-Taylor, Andrea Levine, John McGreevy, Elaine Tyler May, Nellie McKay, Harvard Sitkoff, Judith Smith, Rickie Solinger, and Lauri Umansky. A version of chapter 4 first appeared in Not June Cleaver: Women and Gender in Postwar America, 1945–1960, and I thank Joanne Meyerowitz and anonymous reviewers of that anthology for their astute questions. Carolyn Dean and John L. Thomas read the entire manuscript, and their perceptive comments helped me to transform a dissertation into a book. Generous colleagues at Harvard University have read drafts, have asked cogent questions about liberalism, and have shared perspectives on everything from political and cultural history to childcare. I thank Steven Biel, Catherine Corman, Lizabeth

Although I did not fully realize it at the time, I first began to think about the ideas in Motherhood in Black and White early in graduate school at Brown University. As a first-year graduate student, I listened to Mari Jo Buhle give a lecture about women in the Depression; with that, I began to consider how and why women in the private sphere came under close scrutiny in the 1930s. Two years later, John L. Thomas asked me a question during my preliminary examinations that made me translate vague ideas into a dissertation topic. In the years since, both have been the best kind of allies and the best kind of critics—offering incisive readings, probing questions, and enthusiastic support. I feel privileged to stand in a long line of scholars grateful to them both. I also benefited enormously from the input of Jacqueline Jones and Carolyn Dean. It was as a teaching assistant for Jacqueline Jones that I first learned about Mamie Till Bradley and began to think more seriously about relationships between black and white women and between gender and race. And, in draft after draft, revision after revision, Carolyn Dean has offered strategies for how I could sharpen my analytic frameworks.

“The group” has varied in membership over the years, but it has always been a place where I could think out loud and offer rough drafts to an incredibly talented community of scholars. I thank Lucy Barber, Gail Bederman, Elizabeth Francis, Linda Grasso, Dorothee Kocks, Donna Penn, Jessica Shubow, and Lyde Sizer. Several people deserve far more than acknowledgment. In and out of “the group,” Melani McAlister, Uta G. Poiger, and, especially, Jane Gerhard have sustained me intellectually and emotionally. I have learned a great deal from their scholarship and from their feminism, and I could not have continued, at times, without their expansive support.

As well, I feel blessed to have a circle of friends and family too numerous to name who reminded me that there is a world beyond academia. My parents, Shirley and Donald Feldstein, fostered a wonderful combination of curiosity and respect for the past in my siblings and me. I thank them for encouraging me to ask questions. The extended family of Feldsteins, Nixons, and Suldans offered love, support, and babysitting.

Many people ask me what it is like to write a book that considers motherhood when I am a mother and historian. I cannot even begin to answer that complicated question without acknowledging the importance of reliable childcare in the lives of working parents. For providing loving, safe, stimulating, and fun care to my children, I thank Jennine Babine, Jenn Connor, Suzanne Evans, Daria Shoturma, Sarah Walls, Chris Williams, Gretchen Wurst, and, especially, Olivia Hunter. I thank Sara Feldstein Nixon and Max Feldstein Nixon for staying healthy the past few months, and for filling my life with a joy that I could not have anticipated. They, more than anyone, serve as reminders that there is a world of difference between ideologies of motherhood and the experience of mothering. Asa Nixon has supported me in more ways than I know. He has encouraged me to laugh and to work, and he has shown me, again and again, that risks are worth taking and that change is both possible and good. Asa first introduced the question, "is this a big thing or a little thing?" to our on-the-brink-of-tantrum children; but, in posing this question to them he has asked it of himself and of me, and this question has been invaluable. I thank him for making both the ordinary and extraordinary an adventure and a source of much happiness.
