Acknowledgments

My interest in utopia first took root long ago when as an undergraduate I had the great good fortune of studying Renaissance literature with Harry Berger, Jr., in that locus amoenus among state institutions, University of California at Santa Cruz. If anyone is to blame for my early and persistent confusion of a career of scholarship and teaching with utopia, it is he. I would like also to thank John Hollander, who served as my advisor at Yale and encouraged and restrained my utopian musings in the early stages of this manuscript. The careful reading of Thomas M. Greene, Lawrence Manley, and Susanne Wofford helped both to bring that project to a close and to suggest the outlines of its new incarnation in this book. The generous support of a Charlotte W. Newcombe fellowship and a Northeastern University Junior Research Grant offered precious time to work. Over the years a number of mentors, friends, and colleagues have shaped my thoughts on utopia and given it a worldly referent, these include: Deborah Beard, Frank Blessington, Kate Brogan, Mary Baine Campbell, Kevin Dunn, Margaret Ferguson, James Holstun, Kathleen Kelly, Lee Cullen Khanna, Lawrence Manley, Mary Pat Martin, Stuart Peterfreund, Barbara Rodriguez, John Rogers, Katrina Van Valkenburgh, and Joseph Westlund. My students at Northeastern have helped to inspire and test my work in progress in the crucible of the classroom. Philip Cavalier and Catharine Ferguson, in particular, deserve both praise and thanks. A special debt of gratitude is owed to David L. Clark, Mary Loeffelholz, Jaya Mehta, and Edward Schiffer for challenging and sustaining my work at every turn. Phyllis Leslie has been a maternal font of utopian inspiration, and I hope this book can serve as a tribute to her and to the memory of my father, Harry Leslie. I want particularly to thank Bernhard Kendler of Cornell University Press for his support of this project, as well as the two anonymous readers for their wonderfully lucid and enormously helpful comments.

Finally, this book is for Hugh Baxter, whose judicious interventions, winning distractions, and unfailing companionship have made a world of difference in this book as in everything.

Marina Leslie