This book has been as much a personal journey as an intellectual one. For wise counsel and friendship during my time at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University, and in Washington, D.C., I thank my teacher and constant friend Geoffrey Kemp, who first kindled and then supported my interest in this subject (indeed, in many subjects), and who has always stood by me; W. Scott Thompson, whose agile mind, feisty spirit, and confidence in my efforts helped transform long hours of research into a joy and a provocation; and Alan K. Henrikson, whose encouragement, knowledge, and exacting standards have made this, I hope, a better work.

In different ways, many people have made this book possible. My thanks go to Scheherazade Ahmed, Fouad Ajami, Rabia Ali, Zoe Baird, Barry M. Blechman, Shahram Chubin, Ambereen Dar, Leslie H. Gelb, Charles Glazer, Donna and Arthur A. Hartman, Ayesha Jalal, Anjum Katyal, Robert E. Kiernan, Robert S. Litwak, Edward N. Luttwak, Samia Ahad Mahmood, Peter Malone, Robert Meagher, Steven Miller, John Mojdehi, Michael Nacht, Nevra Neçipoglu, Janne E. Nolan, Martin Peretz, Gilberto Pimentel, the late Arnold L. Raphel, Nafis and Azhar Sadik (for a home away from home), Antoinette Sayeh, Charles N. Shane, Elizabeth Sherwood, Shirin Tahir-Kheli, Cathryn Thorup, Phyllis Webber, Lynn Whittaker, Dean Wilkening, and Sonam Yangchen.

I am also happily indebted to the Center for Science and International Affairs at Harvard University for a two-year Research Associateship, which furnished financial, institutional, and intellectual support; to the International Fellows program of the American Association of University Women; to the Fanny Bullock Workman Fellowship of Wellesley College; and to the Exxon Fellowship at the Fletcher School. The New Republic was generous with its facilities and its friendship.

Holly Bailey and Roger Haydon at Cornell University Press were my excellent editors. For their efforts, and for Bill Nelson's splendid maps, I am grateful.

In a small way, I hope this book will honor the high standards of my grandfather, the late Mirza Abol Hassan Ispahani, and my uncle Syed Hashim Raza. I hope it will also honor the woman who was my first teacher and is my firm friend, my grandmother, Ghamar Ispahani.

With their devotion and spirit of play, Tiny Grimes and Stuff Smith allowed me to approach each day at the wordprocessor gladly. Iraj Ispahani, Lalehnaz Ispahani, and especially Farahnaz Ispahani (who toiled in the labyrinth of my notes) deserve loving thanks for the trust they reposed in me. Lise Hartman's confidence in my project was as unwavering as her affection. This book is a tribute to her talent as a critic and her genius as a friend.

Without my cherished Leon Wieseltier's gifts of imagination, rigor, sweetness, patience, and love, there would be no book. I thank him for the way he is with me.

This book is for my parents. In their support of the intellectual progress and professional careers of their daughters, they have few peers in Pakistani culture. My father has always respected and encouraged my every endeavor; his astute judgment, keen generosity, and loving interest were never far away. (In Karachi, he is my man on the scene.) This book is a tribute, too, to my mother's conviction that a woman's most powerful resource is a fine education, and to her determination that her daughters have one. It was she who imbued in me her own vivid sense of the beauty and the value of the life of the mind.
